MOTIVATION TOWARDS EXCELLENCE

Introduction of Course

In the changing situation role of the industry is leading towards a major shift in the direction of competitive environment. Industrial personnel are required to equip themselves for facing the challenging atmosphere in more effective manner.

For meeting out the challenges associated with new environment, a new set of knowledge, motive, behaviour and approach are needed to compete and excel for achieving a standard of excellence in performance. For performing a task effectively, one aspect that leads to effective performance is the 'hard skill' of the performer. By hard skill, we mean those related to a given profession and acquired, generally through academic education and experience.

On the other hand soft skills relates with the motive and attitude of the person concern. Soft skills include goal setting, set of competitive competencies, proper motivation, internal locus of control, concern for excellence, problem solving attitude etc. These skills help the person to perform the task effectively in the society and organisation.

In the present competitive environment, approach and efforts are required to achieve excellence through managerial training to generate a proper set of knowledge, skills and attitude.
